The Dalton Gang's Last Raid

Disaster in Coffeyville, Kansas

For a year and a half, the Dalton Gang had terrorized the state of Oklahoma, mostly concentrating on train holdups. Though the gang had more murders than loot to their credit, they had managed to successfully evade the best efforts of Oklahoma law officers to bring them to justice. Perhaps success bred overconfidence, but whatever their reasons, the gang members decided to try their hand at robbing not just one bank, but at robbing the First National and Condon Banks in their old hometown of Coffeyville, Kansas, at the same time.

Around 9:30 on the morning of October 5, 1892 five members of the Dalton Gang (Grat, Emmett, and Bob Dalton, Bill Power, and Dick Broadwell) rode into the small town of Cof-feyville. Their objective was to achieve financial security and make outlaw history by simultaneously robbing two banks. From the beginning, their audacious plan went astray. The hitching post where they intended to tie their horses had been torn down due to road repairs. This forced the gang to hitch their horses in a nearby alley, which turned out to be a fateful decision.

To disguise their identity (the Dalton's were well known in Coffeyville), two of the Daltons wore false beards and wigs. Despite this, the gang was recognized as they crossed the town's wide plaza, split up and entered the two banks. Suspicious townspeople watched through the banks' wide front windows as the robbers pulled their guns. Someone on the street shouted, "The bank is being robbed!" and the citizens quickly armed themselves, taking up firing positions around the banks.

The ensuing firefight lasted less than fifteen minutes. Four townspeople lost their lives, four members of the Dalton Gang were gunned down, and a small Kansas town became part of Western lore.

David Elliott was editor of the local newspaper and published a detailed account soon after the gun battle:

"...After crossing the pavement the men

A vivacious blond, Narcissa Whitman was outgoing, good-humored, idealistic, and deeply religious, with a valiant taste for frontier adventure.

Born Narcissa Prentiss in New York State in 1808, she was courted as a schoolgirl by Henry Harmon Spalding. Narcissa declined Spalding's proposal of marriage, but coincidentally, the two were later thrown together under difficult circumstances.

In 1834, Narcissa became inspired with missionary fervor by Samuel Parker, who spoke at her

Indian Captives

The practice of captive-taking among North American Indians goes back to prehistoric times. Centuries before white men came to these shores, captives were taken from neighboring tribes to replenish losses suffered in warfare or to obtain victims to torture in the spirit of revenge. When warfare developed between Europeans and Indians, white captives were taken for the same reasons and, in addition, to hold for ransom or to use to gain bargaining power with an allied European government or colony.

The earliest European captives in Texas were Alvar Nipez Cabeza de Vaca and three companions, survivors of the expedition of Panfilo de Narvaez in 1528. Though these conquistadors used their skills as medicine men to escape from captivity, during the next three centuries numerous discourage an escape by the 15 inmates. The prison's exterior walls were made of adobe.

1889 was the year a 29-year-old U.S. Army lieutenant named John J. Pershing went hiking with three companions in the Grand Canyon. The story's told that they got lost, ran out of water, and were finally guided to safety by a Havasupai Indian. Eighteen years later, Pershing commanded American military forces during World War One.

A 1903 New York City newspaper reported that the mining town of Jerome overlooking the Verde Valley had become the most wicked town in America. According to the newspaper, Jerome outranked Dodge City, Deadwood and Tombstone as a place of crime and debauchery.

The 1907 Fred Harvey hotel and restaurant at Ash Fork west of Williams catered to passengers traveling the steam-powered Santa Fe Railroad. There was a barber shop, reading room, and a dining room lighted by crystal chandeliers.

An old bachelor who lived near Camp Hualapai northwest of Prescott on the road to Kingman rarely if ever took a bath until 1910 when he heard about Halley's Comet. He told a surprised neighbor who found him sitting outside his cabin in a tub of water and soap suds that he was afraid the comet was about to strike the earth and he wanted to die clean.

U.S. Marshals

In the early West, the U.S. marshal dominated local and county police forces. Created in 1789, the U.S. marshal was a presidential appointment ratified by Congress. Between 1840 and 1900 he was elected to cover "districts", which could be states or territories. His main brief was to uphold the federal code of laws. Some of the larger states might have two marshals covering districts described as, say, "Northern" or "Southern," but in most cases the appointment covered one state or territory. Some old-time marshals had policing experience, but that was not essential. In fact, the idea of a U.S. marshal pursuing evildoers personally would probably horrify members of the judiciary. In the old days, however, some of them did get actively involved, but most of the actual field work was delegated to the deputies.

Each marshal had an office deputy who took care of the paper work. He in turn issued orders to the field deputies who were sworn in as "posse comitatus" (the word 'posse' suggests a crowd, but in fact it could be one man). Before 1896, when the U.S. Government issued official commissions and paid a salary, only the office deputies were salaried; the others were sworn in and, in return for serving subpoenas, warrants, and arresting individuals charged with federal crimes (robbing the mails, desertion from the army or the navy, stealing government stock, or murdering Indians on or off the reservation), they were paid a fee, plus mileage. This was $2 per day and the mileage was worked out at about six to ten cents a mile while on active duty. The marshal himself received no salary—his reward was the office itself—but he did quickened their pace, and the three in the front file went into C.M. Condon & Co.'s bank at the southwest door, while the two in the rear ran directly across the street to the First National Bank and entered the front door of that institution. The gentleman [the observer] was almost transfixed with horror. He had an uninterrupted view of the inside of Condon and Co.'s bank, and the first thing that greeted his vision was a Winchester in the hands of one of the men, pointed towards the cashier's counter in the bank. He quickly recovered his lost wits, and realizing the truth of the situation, he called out to the men in the store that 'The bank is being robbed!' Persons at different points on the Plaza heard the cry and it was taken up and quickly passed around the square.

The Dalton Gang

Coffeyville

At the same time several gentlemen saw the two men enter the First National Bank, suspecting their motive, followed close at their heels and witnessed them 'holding up' the men in this institution. They gave the alarm on the east side of the Plaza. A 'call to arms' came simultaneously with the alarm and in less time than it takes to relate the fact a dozen men with Winchesters and revolvers in their hands were ready to resist the escape of the unwelcome visitors."

As the townspeople arm themselves, the desperados enter the two banks—Bill Powers, Dick Broadwell, and Grat Dalton the C.M. Condon bank, Bob and Emmett Dalton the First National. Inside the Condon Bank, three employees are forced at gunpoint to fill a sack with money. One brave teller declares to the robbers that the vault has a time lock and can't be opened for another ten minutes (this was untrue.) The robbers decide to wait:

"...Just at this critical juncture the citizens opened fire from the outside [of the Condon Bank] and the shots from their Winchesters and shot-guns pierced the plate-glass windows and rattled around the bank. Bill Powers and Dick Broadwell replied from the inside, and each fired from four to six shots at citizens on the outside. The battle then began in earnest. Evidently recognizing that the fight was on, Grat Dalton asked whether there was a back door through which they could get to the street.

church in Amity, New York, about the need for missionaries in the Oregon country. Dr. Marcus Whitman was an aspiring missionary who was preparing to accompany Parker to perform Christian work on the far frontier and demonstrate the feasibility of bringing women and children across the West. Shortly before departing with Parker for the West in 1835, Whitman met Narcissa and was charmed. She was personable, and they shared similar Christian interests.

Dr. Whitman returned to New York after exploring the route and the possibilities for Christian missionary work in the Pacific Northwest. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions would not approve unmarried missionaries. Marcus and Narcissa married in February

Marcus Whitman

1836, then made plans for an overland trip to establish a medical mission in Oregon. Accompanying them on their journey was another missionary couple—Henry and Eliza Spalding.

Narcissa enthusiastically sewed a large tent for the journey, along with some dresses. She bought a pair of small men's boots for riding sidesaddle, and she obtained an inflatable life preserver for crossing wild western rivers. Although weakened from a recent stillbirth, Eliza Spalding proved to be a grimly courageous companion. Henry, however, was apparently consumed with the spite of a failed suitor, and he was disagreeable to both Narcissa and Marcus. "My dear husband has suffered more from him in consequence of his wicked jealousy," wrote Narcissa, "and his great pique towards me, than can be known in this world."

Narcissa's high spirits helped overcome the contention, and the missionaries joined a brigade of trappers. There were struggles and hardships, but Narcissa and Eliza relished their roles as the first white women to cross the Rocky Mountains. Dr. Whitman established a mission near present-day Walla Walla, Washington, while the Spaldings settled near present-day Lewiston, Idaho. Political control of the Oregon country was shared by the United States and Great Britain through a longstanding agreement, but American trappers and traders had long explored the region. And the successful

Dead Outlaws' Loot Flagstaff Treasure?

It is called the "Dead Outlaws' Loot" and may consist of a fortune in gold and silver. Some of it may have been found; maybe all of it, but then again maybe it is still there. For years treasure hunters have searched the area, a secluded mountain spot called Veit Springs, 8,500 feet high in the mountains near Flagstaff.

Arizona abounds with tales of lost treasure. This cache stems from a stagecoach robbery in 1881. On May 10 of that year two mailbags were removed from the boot of a stage traveling between Canyon Diablo and Flagstaff, the route now followed by Interstate 40. In the bags were small gold and silver bars and some coins, a total value at the time of about $125,000. Because of recent robberies in northern Arizona, Wells Fargo officials thought it smart to hide the treasure in the mail, in two whiskey kegs wrapped tightly in paper. But word of the plan leaked out and five bandits were waiting on the trail. Since the robbery involved the United States mail, a cavalry troop joined in on the chase. Scouts picked up the robbers' trail and tracked them into the mountains to the spot now known as Veit Springs. There the soldiers found five men camped in a one-room cabin built against a giant boulder. One of the men matched the description of one of the robbers. The gang opened fire and the soldiers killed all five. The dead men were buried in a common grave. According to the report of the officer in charge, Captain E. C. Hentig, no gold or silver was found. Hentig was later killed in a skirmish with Indians.

In the summer of 1913 a local character named "Short Jimmy" McGuire reportedly turned up with what may have been some of the stolen coins. While buying drinks for the house at Black's Saloon in Flagstaff, he claimed he located the loot by using a water witch's willow fork. A crowd soon gathered. After his fourth drink, McGuire became ill and collapsed. A doctor rushed to his side and pronounced him dead, apparently from a heart attack. His pants pockets were stuffed with coins, more money than he had ever been seen to carry. Treasure seekers raced from the saloon and converged on Veit Springs. They found McGuire's tracks and his campsite, but no trace of any diggings. To this day the treasure has never been found.

Spanish and Mexican captives remained many years in the camps of Apache, Comanche, Kiowa, and Wichita raiders. During the succeeding half century after Indian warfare broke out with whites in the 1830s, many settlers underwent Indian captivity.

The life of a captive was fraught with perils and hardships. Survival frequently depended upon the whim of the captor and the fortitude displayed by the captive. Mature males who fell into Indian hands generally forfeited their lives. Captive white women in Texas, as in much of the territory west of the Mississippi River, were usually compelled to serve their captors as concubines and menials (the roles of most Indian women). Their ordeals frequently led to early deaths, before or after rescue. The experiences of Rachel Plummer and Sarah though subservient to their captors, were treated with unexpected respect.

Indian raiders killed captive children who lagged behind when the Indians were pursued. Children who arrived safely at the Indian village, however, usually were adopted as replacements for deceased relatives and thereafter treated as true sons or daughters. Many of these youngsters enjoyed the wild, free life of the Indians and became so completely assimilated that they resisted attempts to redeem them. Some youths became fierce warriors who raided the settlements. Among the most formidable "white Indians" were Clinton and Jeff Smith, Herman Lehmann, Adolph Korn, Rudolph

Rachel Plummer

Ann Horn, who suffered severe physical abuse, dramatically illustrate the horrors of female captivity among the Plains Indians. Abuse of captive women, however, was by no means universal. Some women,

Wyatt Earp Loses His Job

Born in 1848, Wyatt Earp was one of the five Earp brothers, some of whom became famous for their participation in the shootout at the O.K. Corral in 1881. Before moving to Tombstone in 1879, however, Wyatt had already become a controversial figure. For much of his life, he worked in law enforcement, but his own allegiance to the rule of law was conditional at best.

In 1870, residents of Lamar, Missouri, elected Wyatt town constable. He did a good job as constable, but within a year his wife died of typhoid and he began wandering about the West. Not long after, Wyatt was arrested for stealing horses in Indian Territory, and he fled to Kansas to escape prosecution.

In 1873, Wyatt joined his older brother James in Wichita, Kansas, the rowdy cattle town that was the northern terminus of the Chisholm Trail. Wyatt again pinned on a badge. At first, it appears that he worked for a private security force employed by local saloons and businesses to keep order, but Wichita Marshal Michael Meagher hired him as an official city policeman by 1875.

Wyatt soon proved to be a daunting police officer. He knew how to use his Remington pistol, and he kept his skills sharp with frequent sessions of target practice. However, Wyatt also liked the Remington because it had a strap that made it an effective club: whenever possible, he preferred to pistol-whip his opponents rather than shoot them. He was also a formidable fistfighter. His friend and fellow law officer, Bat Masterson, later recalled that, "There were few men in the West who could whip Earp in a rough-and-tumble fight."

During the next year, Wyatt again proved his mettle as a law officer, but his political skills were less refined. In April, Wichita held an election for city marshal. An opponent named William Smith challenged Wyatt's boss, Michael Meagher, for the office. On April 2, Smith made several disparaging remarks about Meagher, and Wyatt took offense. Wyatt confronted Smith and beat him in a fistfight.

Although Meagher won reelection, he was unable to save Wyatt's job. A Wichita commission decided that Wyatt's violent behavior was unacceptable and did not rehire him as a police officer. As the town newspaper conceded, "It is but justice to Earp to say he has made an excellent officer," but the young lawman had to learn to control his passions and play the political game.

The Clydesdales Are Coming to Little Mesa Cafe!

The Little Mesa Cafe is saddling up with the USA Clydesdale Preservation Foundation (USACPF) hosting a benefit breakfast on Saturday, November 30, from 7:00 a.m.-1:00 p.m. One half of the proceeds for all pancakes sold will go to help these "at risk" horses. Food specials, door prizes, and raffles will be offered to all. The horses will be on site and dressed for the holidays from 7:00 a.m. – noon. Bring the kids and have their Christmas photo taken with these majestic horses. This is a great opportunity to stop by and meet a Clydesdale and learn more about one of the rarest horse breeds in the world. A professional photographer will be taking photos for donations as part of the fundraiser.

USA Clydesdale Preservation Foundation (USACPF) is a local 501(c)3 non-profit organization dedicated to the preservation of the Clydesdale horse breed. Founded in 2012 in Gilbert, Arizona, by Rebecca Stivers, USACPF's goal is to educate the public about the "at risk" classification of the Clydesdale Horse.

With their origins in Scotland during the early 19th century, the Clydesdale was bred specifically as a working farm horse. The Clydesdales are one of the largest of the draft horses ranging from 1800 to 2500 lbs and 16 to 19 hands in height.

Clydesdales came to the US in the late 19th century. They were utilized as a farm horse and war horse in the earlier years, but their numbers declined drastically due to casualties of war and the industrial revolution, as they were no longer needed for their pulling power. One of the largest issues for the Clydesdale Horse is the lack of having a new purpose for the breed. Promoting the Clydesdale as a riding horse will help create a demand for them.

Thanks to Budweiser's marketing, the Clydesdale horse has become an American icon, but the population is still "at risk and vulnerable" as described by both the Equus Trust Foundation and the Rare Breeds Survival Trust.

USACPF hopes to make a difference in the population numbers with their volunteers' hard work and dedication. The volunteers promote the versatility of the Clydesdales by riding the horses in parades, drill team demonstrations, as well as educating through social media, schools, and community events.

USACPF is always looking for volunteers who would like to help with the organization. No horse experience is necessary, but a passion to save the Clydesdales horse is important. We also accept monetary donations and wish list items. For more info and a full list of wish list items, please visit our website usaclydesdalepreservationfoundation.org

For 34 years the Little Mesa Cafe, a local family owned and operated Family Restaurant, has played an active role in our Mesa and Arizona community. This is a chance for everyone to help and have some fun too!

Your participation, donations, gift certificates and door prizes are greatly appreciated. For more info contact David at the Little Mesa Cafe, 3929 E. Main St., Mesa, Arizona (480-830-6201).

Why Have I Never Been Told This About Sciatica?

Your sciatic nerve is the longest and largest nerve in your body. It begins in your lower back as five smaller nerves joining together and extends to your pelvis, thigh, knee, calf, ankle, foot and toes. When this large nerve becomes inflamed the condition is called sciatica and the pain can be intense! There may be burning, prickling, and other sensations along the path of the nerve. Ironically, the leg may also feel numb!

The medical approach to sciatica is usually to treat its symptoms with painkillers, chiropractic is superior to muscle relaxers and orthopedic procedures such as traction, physical therapy and surgery in extreme cases. Sciatica is particularly frustrating to treat with drugs because in many cases even strong painkillers bring little or no relief.

Vertebral subluxations (spinal nerve root irritation caused by spinal misalignment) can be directly related to sciatica. Chiropractors remove subluxations to relieve sciatic pain. Many sciatica sufferers have experienced dramatic relief after chiropractic care, and have found that

Through November 30th only, the initial visit charge will be $68 or less (I might charge new patients at least $179 for this-includes treatment).

Tell the receptionist you'd like to take advantage of our Sciatica Special before November 30, 2019.

Fischer, and Kiowa Dutch.

White girls captured before the age of puberty usually became assimilated and married chiefs or warriors. The most famous of these, Cynthia Ann Parker, married the Comanche chief Peta Nocona and became the mother of Quanah Parker, last war chief of the tribe. When recaptured by Lawrence Sullivan Ross in 1860 and reunited with her relatives, she tried to run away to her Indian family. Millie Durgan lived happily to old age as the wife of a Kiowa warrior. On the other hand, girls taken at childbearing age hated their captors and sometimes risked their lives to escape. Martina Diaz, one of many captives rescued by the Indian agent Lawrie Tatum, hid in his house from threatening warriors. Matilda Lockhart, thirteen years old when captured and treated brutally by the Comanches, precipitated the Council House Fight in San Antonio in 1840 when she accused the Indians of hiding other captives.

Many Texas captives were rescued or ransomed by relatives, Texas Rangers, soldiers, Indian agents, or traders. Britton Johnson, a black rancher, traded goods for his own wife and children, the sister of Millie Durgan, and several other captives. Sam Houston purchased Mrs. Elizabeth Kellogg, seized in the Comanche raid on Fort Parker in 1836, from friendly Delaware Indians. Two young boys taken in the same raid, John Parker and James Plummer, were ransomed by Gen. Zachary Taylor in 1842. Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston rescued Rebecca Jane Fisher and her brother, William Gililand, captured by Comanches who killed their parents near Refugio in 1842. Sul Ross redeemed a young white girl in 1858 during an attack on a Comanche village. She had forgotten her name, and her identity was never established. She was raised as a member of his family and given the name Lizzie Ross.

When the Comanches and Kiowas were driven onto reservations north of the Red River and compelled to release their prisoners, many captives had become so completely assimilated that they chose to remain with their captors. Most of these had married Indians, and it is estimated that 30 percent of Apaches, Comanches, and Kiowas had captive blood in their veins.

He was told that there was none. He then ordered Mr. Ball and Mr. Carpenter [two bank employees] to carry the sack of money to the front door. Reaching the hall on the outside of the counter, the firing of the citizens through the windows became so terrific and the bullets whistled so close around their heads that the robbers and both bankers retreated to the back room again. Just then one at the southwest door was heard to exclaim: 'I am shot; I can't use my arm; it is no use, I can't shoot any more.'

A similar scene played out at the First National where Bob and Emmett Dalton forced the bank's employees to fill their sack with money. Using the employees as shields, the robbers attempted to escape the bank, only to be driven back inside by heavy gunfire:

then ordered the three bankers to walk out from behind the counter in front of him, and they put the whole party out at the front door. Before they reached the door, Emmett called to Bob to 'Look out there at the left.' Just as the bankers and their customers had reached the pavement, and as Bob and Emmett appeared at the door, two shots were fired at them from the doorway of the drug store. Neither one of them was hit. They were driven back into the bank. Bob stepped to the door a second time, and raising his Winchester to his shoulder, took deliberate aim and fired in a southerly direction. Emmett held his Winchester under his arm while he tied a string around the mouth of the sack containing the money. They then ordered the young men to open the back door and let them out. Mr. Shepard complied and went with them to the rear of the building, when they passed out into the alley. It was then that the bloody work of the dread desperadoes began."

Many of the townspeople gathered in Isham's Hardware Store near the banks. Not only did the unarmed citizens get rifles, shotguns, and ammunition,

Cattle Cars

In the mid-1880s, most cattlemen shipped their livestock to the eastern stockyards aboard slat-sided railroad boxcars designed specifically for that purpose.

Cars for livestock had come into use well before the first cattle drive from Texas to a railhead—Sedalia, Missouri—in 1865. But the early cars were intended for short hauls, during which the cattle had neither food nor water. On longer trips the steers were periodically unloaded into pens to eat and drink, then herded back aboard. Cattle handled in this confusing and time-consuming way “shrank” in transit. The annual weight loss cost cattlemen an estimated $24 million.

To cut such losses, a number of railroad-car companies developed live-stock cars with built-in feeding and watering devices. The Burton Stock Car Company's poplar version of the improved car admirably served about 16 cattle. At way-stops, water troughs were filled through pipes from a port in the roof; boxes under the floor carried feed that a stock tender tossed into the car.

Cattlemen were very pleased with this combination of simplicity and efficiency. The new livestock cars speeded up long trips, provided better care for the cargo and were said to cut cattle shrinkage by two-thirds.

ISM Win Gets Hamlin Into the Finals

By Ralph Henderson

November's Territorial Road trip took us to ISM Speedway for Friday's evening truck race, Saturday's double header Xfinity and K&N race and Sunday's featured semi-final Blue Greens Vacation 500 race for the NASCAR Monster Cup series final four. Sunday's highly anticipated pionship in their season finale.

Friday evening, despite a lap-one penalty forcing him to the rear of the field, Halmer Friesen rallied to take the checkered flag receive a percentage of the fees paid to his deputies.

Before 1896 deputy U.S. marshals were eligible to receive state or territorial rewards for apprehending criminals, but not the U.S. marshal or his salaried office deputy. In 1869, for instance, Wild Bill Hickok arrested two deserters from the 10th Cavalry and lodged them in the jail at Fort Hays. He later received the reward for their capture. In some instances, however, promised rewards were withdrawn on a technicality or the recipient might have to share it with his assistants. The term "bounty hunter" was more aptly termed "man-hunter" in the old days. Those individuals who set out on man-hunts were invariably either commissioned police officers or employees of railroads, express agencies or well-known organizations such as the Pinkertons.

In Indian Territory (present day Oklahoma), enforcing the law could be somewhat complicated. Federal laws were aligned with tribal law and these laws applied only to individuals belonging to the nation or tribe where the alleged offenses took place. Things were complicated further as frequently the Indians had their own ideas of how justice should be carried out. Judge Isaac Parker, whose United States Court for the Western District of Arkansas included the Indian Territory in its jurisdiction, employed a large number of deputy U.S. marshals, many of them blacks or Indians. The marshals in the district routinely faced some of the roughest and toughest criminals on the continent, but if Parker's reputation as the "hanging judge" is anything to go by, these men did a remarkable job.

As counties were established and cities were granted the right to form their own governments, local police forces became commonplace. A town marshal or chief of police generally had no jurisdiction outside the town's limits; that was the province of the county sheriff. Since both were concerned with civil rather than federal crimes, the U.S. marshal for the state or territory retained that responsibility. He did not normally interfere in the matter of civil crime, but could provide deputies to assist if asked.

The marshals had numerous other duties as well, including the disbursement of money. The marshals paid the fees and expenses of the court clerks, U.S. Attorneys, jurors, and witnesses. They rented the courtrooms and jail space and hired the bailiffs, clerks, and janitors. They made sure the prisoners were present, the jurors were available, and the witnesses were on time. The marshals have also taken the responsibility for a number of other tasks over the years, such as taking the national census through 1870, distributing Presidential proclamations, registering enemy aliens in times of war, capturing fugitive slaves, and protecting the American borders.

Their motto is "Justice, Integrity, and Service," and through the years, their heroics in the face of lawlessness have often become famous, especially in the days of the Wild Old West.

but the store also provided an excellent view of the two banks and the alley where the gang had tied their horses:

"...The moment that Grat Dalton and his companions, Dick Broadwell and Bill Power, left the bank [the C.M. Condon Bank] that they had just looted, they came under the guns of the men in Isham's store. Grat Dalton and Bill Powers each received mortal wounds before they had retreated twenty steps. The dust was seen to fly from their clothes, and Powers in his desperation attempted to take refuge in the rear doorway of an adjoining store, but the door was locked and no one answered his request to be let in. He kept his feet and clung to his Winchester until he reached his horse, when another ball struck him in the back and he fell dead at the feet of the animal that had carried him on his errand of robbery.

Grat Dalton, getting under cover of the oil tank, managed to reach the side of a barn that stands on the south side of the alley... [At this point, Marshal Connelly ran across a vacant lot into "Death Alley" from the south to the spot where the bandits had tied their horses.] The marshal sprang into the alley with his face towards the point where the horses were hitched. This movement brought him with his back to the murderous Dalton, who was seen to raise his Winchester to his side and without taking aim fire a shot into the back of the brave officer. Marshal Connelly fell forward on his face within twenty feet of where his murderer stood.

Dick Broadwell in the meantime had reached cover in the Long-Bell Lumber Company's yards, where he laid down for a few moments. He was wounded in the back. A lull occurred in the firing after Grat Dalton and Bill Power had fallen. Broadwell took advantage of this and crawled out of his hiding-place and mounted his horse and rode away. A ball from Kloehr's [John

The Texas Navy Small, But Effective

After Texas broke away from Mexico, the fledgling republic needed a way to harass Mexican supply ships. The Texas Navy began in 1836 as four small armed ships that were used to disrupt Mexican seaborne supply lines. According to Teddy Roosevelt, the Texas Navy succeeded in preventing reinforcements and provisions at their naval base at Matamoros from reaching General Santa Anna's forces then occupying Texas. This forced Santa Anna to disperse his large army, to forage for food and supplies. This in turn is what led to his defeat at San Jacinto by General Sam Houston, as he was outnumbered.

By 1840, with the backing of Republic of Texas President Mirabeau Bonaparte Lamar, it boasted a 20-gun sloop as its flagship, plus six smaller sailing ships and a converted passenger steamer. Always short of funds, the little navy was even hired out to the rebelling Mexican state of Yucatan for $8,000 a month. For a year and a half it prevented a Mexican naval attack on Texas, and in 1843 it disabled the enemy fleet at Campeche. But that same year then-President Sam Houston, desperate for money, deactivated the navy after trying—without success—to find a buyer for it.

Narcissa Whitman

Missionary

trek of the missionaries helped create "Oregon fever" for a generation of American pioneers. The hordes of settlers who swarmed across the Oregon Trail secured the Pacific Northwest for the United States.

During the trip west, Narcissa became pregnant. On her 29th birthday, March 14, 1837, she gave birth to a daughter, Alice Clarissa, who was the first white child born in the Northwest.

Tragically, Alice fell in the Walla Walla River and drowned on June 23, 1839.

The grief-stricken mother would not surrender her little girl for burial for four days. "She did not begin to change in her appearance much for the first three days," Narcissa explained in a letter to her parents. "This proved to be a great comfort to me, for so long as she looked natural and was so sweet and I could caress her, I could not bear to have her out of my sight."

The lonely Whitmans took children into their mission to raise and teach, including the daughters of mountain men Jim Bridger and Joe Meek. The mission was a popular stopover for emigrants, and the gracious Narcissa became a widely loved celebrity. Narcissa recorded her experiences in many diaries and letters, which have survived to tell the tale of her life as a pioneer.

Throughout their time in Oregon Country, Narcissa and Marcus encountered trouble with the native tribes. The Cayuse and the Nez Percé tribes were suspicious of the activities of the Americans. As early as 1841, natives had tried to force the Whitmans to leave the ancestral homeland.

In 1847, a measles epidemic broke out among the native population. Spread to the natives by contact with whites, the native population lacked immunity to the disease and it spread quickly. The American populations had some limited immunity to measles which meant a lower mortality rate for the whites. This discrepancy stirred discontent among the natives who felt Dr. Whitman was only curing the white people while letting Indian children die. The resentment concerning all the different issues boiled over on November 29, 1847, when several Cayuse Indians attacked the mission, brutally killing both Marcus and Narcissa. A former mission Indian propped up Narcissa's corpse and beat her face with a whip. A general uprising ensued, resulting in the deaths of a dozen other mission people. The mission—which is now a National Historic Site—was burned to the ground.

Never Been Lost

Above all things, the Plainsmen had to have an instinct for direction.

I never had a compass in my life, but I was never lost.

The Dalton Gang

Kloehr, a townsman] rifle and a load of shot from a gun in the hands of Carey Seaman overtook him before he had ridden twenty feet. Bleeding and dying he clung to his horse and passed out of the city. His dead body was subsequently found alongside of the road a half-mile west of the city.

As Marshal Connelly fell, Bob and Emmett Dalton—successfully escaping the First National Bank—ran down a side alley and into ‘Death Alley’ from the north.

When the two Daltons reached the junction of the alleys they discovered F.D. Benson in the act of climbing through a rear window with a gun in his hand. Divining his object, Bob fired at him point blank at a distance of not over thirty feet. The shot missed Mr. Benson, but struck a window and demolished the glass. Bob then stepped into the alley and glanced up towards the tops of the buildings as if he suspected that the shots that were being fired at the time were coming from that direction. As he did so, the men at Isham's took deliberate aim at him from their position in the store and fired. The notorious leader of the Dalton gang evidently received a severe if not fatal wound at this moment. He staggered across the alley and sat down on a pile of dressed curbstones near the city jail. True to his desperate nature he kept his rifle in action and fired several shots from where he was seated. His aim was unsteady and the bullets went wild. He arose to his feet and sought refuge alongside of an old barn west of the city jail, and leaning against the southwest corner, brought his rifle into action again and fired two shots in the direction of his pursuers. A ball from Mr. Kloehr's rifle struck the bandit full in the breast and he fell upon his back among the stones that covered the ground where he was standing.

After shooting Marshal Connelly, Grat Dalton made another attempt to reach his horse. He passed by his fallen victim and had advanced probably twenty feet from where he was standing when he fired the fatal shot. Turning his face to his pursuers, he again attempted to use his Winchester. John Kloehr's rifle spoke in unmistakable tones another time, and the oldest member of the band dropped with a bullet in his throat and a broken neck.

Emmett Dalton had managed to escape unhurt up to this time. He kept under shelter after he reached the alley until he attempted to mount his horse. A half-dozen rifles sent their contents in the direction of his person as he undertook to get into the saddle. Emmett succeeded in getting into the saddle, but not until he had received a shot through the right arm and one through the left hip and groin. During all this time he had clung to the sack containing the money they had taken from the First National Bank. Instead of riding off, as he might have done, Emmett boldly rode back to where Bob Dalton was lying, and reaching down his hand, attempted to lift his dying brother on the horse with him. ‘It's no use,’ faintly whispered the fallen bandit, and just then Carey Seamen fired the contents of both barrels of his shot-gun into Emmett's back. He dropped from his horse, carrying the sack containing over twenty thousand dollars with him, and both fell near the feet of Bob, who expired a moment thereafter.”
